1.3. Physiographic of district

The district area forms a part of Indo-Gangetic plain and Sutlej sub-basin of Indus basin. The area as a whole is almost flat with a gentle slope towards the Western and North-westerly direction. The flatness of the topography is indicated by the fact that only one contour line is passing through the district. This contour line runs from southeast towards north-west. It divides the district into almost two halves. In the eastern half it is below 200 m. The elevation ranges from minimum of 190 m in southwest at village Shamkot to maximum of 227 m in the northeast. The general slope of the district is from northeast to southwest as indicated by spot heights. The physiographic of the district is broadly classified from south to north into four distinct features i.e. Upland plain, Sand dune tract, younger flood plain and active flood plain of Sutlej. The Sutlej is an important perennial river, which forms major drainage of the area and runs parallel to the Northern border of the district. There are two types of soils viz Sierozem and Desert soils in Moga District. The sierozem soils are found in major parts of the district and desert soils are comparatively found in a relatively smaller area towards western part of the district.

1.4 Geology

The district is occupied by geological formations of Quaternary age comprising of recent alluvial deposits. These alluvial formations in turn overlain by Aeolian sands except in the area falling in proximity of Sutlej River. Geological setting, distribution of rainfall and geological formations constituting the aquifers, essentially controls the hydro geological framework of any district.

1.5 Climate and Rainfall

The climate of the district can be classified as tropical and dry sub humid. According to IMD, the district get moderate rainfall, normal annual rainfall is about 498 mm, which is spread over 24 rainy days. 78% of rainfall occurs during south-west monsoon and temperature mean maximum in June is 39.5 degree C and in January is 5.1 degree C.
